

Iran Data Portal

Sazman-e Mojahedin-e Enqelab-e Islami-ye Iran
Organization of the Mojahedin of the Islamic Revolution of Iran

The Organization of the Mojahedin of the Islamic Revolution was founded in 1979 when seven (armed and civil) underground groups unified and established a new organization. These groups belonged to the non-cleric religious followers of Ayatollah Khomeini. Before the revolution, they had managed a number of armed operations against American military advisers. During the revolution, they were in charge of the protection of Ayatollah Khomeini when he returned to Iran from exile on February 1, 1979. They were also active in the armed clashes of the final days of the Iranian revolution.

At its founding, there were fewer than 1000 affiliate members of the Organization. In the first months after the revolution, they had two priorities: preventing the restoration of the previous regime, and combating other revolutionary groups who opposed the Islamic Republic regime. As a result, many of the members of the Organization were also active members of the Revolutionary Committees. Moreover, the founders of the Organization and the Corps of the Revolutionary Guards were more or less the same. They also established the Intelligence Unit of the Corps of the Revolutionary Guards, and later many of the members of the Organization became the main staff of the Ministry of Intelligence.

In the political developments of the early years after the revolution, the Organization took an active role in opposing Abulhasan Banisadr's nomination[1] for the presidency. In the run-up to the first post-revolution parliamentary elections in 1980, the group was part of a conservative coalition of those supporting the Islamic nature of the emerging regime. In the first parliament (1980-1984), they had a small active faction of about thirty members. Mohammad Ali Rajaei, prime minister (1980-1) and president (1981), although not a member, had a close relationship with the Organization and organized his cabinet with their consultation.

From the very beginning, tensions existed between the left and right wings of the Organization about the role of the state in policymaking on labor rights, land reform, and commodity distribution. These tensions escalated when the representative of Ayatollah Khomeini in the Organization, Ayatollah Rasti Kashani, who favored the right wing, claimed that his supervision over the Organization meant that he could interfere in all areas including the appointment and dismissal of members. Protesting this position, many left-wing and moderate members resigned in 1982. From 1982 until 1986, the Organization was led by rightist members, and in 1986 the Organization notified Ayatollah Khomeini of its dissolution.

In 1991, left-wing members gathered together again and decided to resume the Organization's activities under a new title, adding the words "of Iran" to the name. The Organization began to publish a biweekly magazine called "Asr-e Ma" to publicize their positions on political, social, and economic issues. In foreign policy, their priority was to prevent U.S. influence in the region through interaction with the Soviet Union, European powers, and other countries. The Organization also advocated social equality and state intervention in economy. However, like other left-wing groups, it gradually revised its main values and put more emphasis on the restriction of the Supreme Leader's power within the boundaries of the 1979 constitution, equal weight for the republican and Islamic aspects of the regime, expanded participation of the public in decision-making, political rights, and a modern reading of Islam. In foreign policy, they now emphasize normalizing the U.S.-Iran relationship. Economically, their goals are, in turn, independence, justice, and development, under the label of "justice-centered development."

In 1997, the members of the group were among the active strategists and campaigners for presidential candidate Mohammad Khatami. With Khatami's landslide victory, the group's members entered the executive with high-ranking positions. In the sixth parliament (2000-2004), though they had only two representatives, both were deputy speakers of the parliament. Prominent members of the Organization include Behzad Nabavi, the deputy speaker of the sixth parliament and former Minister of Heavy Industry in Mousavi's cabinet; Mohsen Armin, the deputy speaker of the sixth parliament and the spokesman of the Organization; Mohammad Salamati, the secretary-general of the Organization; and Hashem Aghajari, a history professor and prominent intellectual.

In 2002, Hashem Aghajari was accused for apostasy and sentenced to death because of a lecture he had given about Islamic Protestantism. The sentence led to widespread protests in Iran's universities. As a result of the protests and international pressure, the death sentence was eventually commuted to five years in prison.

In the run-up to the elections of the seventh parliament (2004-2008), almost all of the Organization's candidates were disqualified by the Guardian Council and so the Organization announced that it would boycott the elections. In the 2005 presidential election, the party nominated Mostafa Mo'een, the former Minister of Higher Education. However, in a controversially administered election, Mo'een ranked fifth among seven rival candidates, and the Organization lost the executive as the last branch of the government in which they had influence.

In the 2009 presidential election, they first invited former president Khatami to run, but after Khatami withdrew his name, they supported Mir-Hossein Mousavi. During the severe crackdown after the election, a number of Organization members were arrested, including Behzad Nabavi, Feizollah Arabsorkhi, Mostafa Tajzadeh, Parviz Qadiani, and Javad Emam.

The Organization has placed great emphasis on internal unity and coherence. As a result, in the period between 1991 and 1999, they did not recruit any new members. However, with the establishment of direct municipal elections in 1999, the strategy changed and the party recruited 200 new members in 1999 alone. They have branches in 28 provinces in the country. Internally, the Organization is composed of the Congress, the Central Committee, the Arbitration Council, the Political Council, and the Executive Board. The Congress is the highest authority within the Organization, and is held each year in July. There the members elect the fifteen main members and three substitute members of the Central Committee.

[1] Bani-Sadr was the first president of the Islamic Republic of Iran (1980-1981). He was impeached on 21 June 1981 and immediately left the country into exile. The main reason for the impeachment was the conflict between the liberal-minded Bani-Sadr and the more conservative Party of the Islamic Republic of Iran.

Official Website: www.mojahedin-enghelab.net

Literature:

Nabavi, Behzad. 2007. Az Sazman-e Mojahedin-e Enghelab-e Eslami Ta Sazman-e Mojahedin-e Enghelab-e Eslami-e Iran [From the Organization of Mojahedin of Islamic Revolution to the Organization of Mojahedin of Islamic Revolution of Iran]. Tehran: Sazman-e Mojahedin-e Enghelab-e Eslami.

“Sazman-e Mojahedin-e Enghelab-e Eslami- Iran”. 2009. BBC Persian. http://www.bbc.co.uk/persian/iran/2009/02/090210\_ir\_mujahedin\_inglab.shtml.

Roy, Olivier, and Sfeir, Antoine. 2007. The Columbia World Dictionary of Islamism. New York: Columbia University Press.